INTENSIVE HEALING FOCUS: Paralyzed dog's spinal cord nerves, discs and vertebra regenerated

Brent Atwater

I am a human MRI. I see inside the body to locate physical or emotional issues that are creating physical problems. The healing energy that I direct physically repairs, regenerates, and restores, at the molecular level, cellular tissue, organs, bone, nerves, and neural pathways. My international Medical Intuitive & Distant Energy Healing has been studied by and documented at Duke University, the Association for Research and Enlightenment (ARE; based on Edgar Cayce's readings) and the North Carolina State University (NCSU) Veterinary School and other medical research hospitals and centers with whom I am participating in current clinical and research trials and independent case studies.

My adventure with my dog, Friend, initiated some of the directions in my healing abilities in people, detailed below.

Lessons from Friend

Let me give an example of how this works. My dog Friend, a 15 1/2 year-old red border collie, ran around a corner, slipped and fell. I carried him to his bed as he was unable to get up. The following morning he was unable to walk. I took him to NCSU School of Veterinary Medicine. Due to his age and the fact that he had crushed his vertebrae and spinal cord nerves, he also had difficulty breathing. The veterinarian suggested euthanasia [but I believed intuitively that there was still hope]. Friend was placed in intensive care and put on a respirator

At first I sat in ICU with Friend once a day and did hands-on healing for about an hour. When the ICU became filled with patients, the nurses asked that I not stay as long, so I worked on Friend from a distance and pictured him in my mind. I placed him in a continuous healing bubble while I was gone.

After two weeks, Friend was stable enough to go home with an oxygen machine. He was the first dog to leave the vet school with an oxygen machine and nasal tube.

The anticipated course of recuperation for such injuries was dismal; virtually impossible for a 15 1/2 year-old canine. Back surgery would consist of fusing the spine together or adding a rod and reattaching the damaged nerves that controlled his breathing, with marginal prospects for improvements at best. They did not feel Friend was physically capable of handling the hours required under anesthesia. IF the nerves regenerated at all, it would begin at about 120 days (four months), and according to the veterinarians, "He's had a good life."

Once home, I determined that the best course of recuperation would be daily energy work in small doses to regenerate his nerves and spinal cord vertebrae and discs. I addressed each issue separately; rebuilding his health system by system. I created a physical therapy program for his legs to keep his muscles from atrophying. I would extend and retract his legs as if he were walking. Friend was such a good sport about listening to my songs as I worked with him!

The oxygen machine's nasal tube (also used by humans with emphysema) irritated Friend's nasal cavity and created infections. We would change the tube from side to side in his nose, however the infections continued. Therefore, I was forced to configure a way to raise Friend's oxygen levels without the machine. Throughout the first two and a half months, I had to turn him from side to side and sit him upright every four hours around the clock, so he would not accumulate fluid in his lungs

I learned more about pulmonary function, than I had ever wanted to know, in order to discern what I had to do physiologically to have Friend be able to breathe on his own. Using energy healing, I helped his lungs to heal and raised his blood oxygen saturation

After two more weeks, at Friend's follow-up hospital visit his arterial blood gases showed his oxygen levels had risen from 55 to 70 (normal range is 70 to 98), He was released and sent home without supplemental oxygen.

Friend completely recovered from his crushed spinal cord injury following his fall, and he was able to walk and breathe on his own after ninety days, and he lived for the following two years. The official case report read, "We don't know what you are doing with Friend, but keep it up"

Healing gifts unfolding

To date, I have used these techniques to help others with respiratory problems: sealing holes in lungs, removing fluid in the lungs so clients can be taken off ventilators, and raising and stabilizing clients' oxygen saturation levels during surgeries and in the following recovery period, as well as correcting oxygen starvation from other dysfunctions of disease

I have found my healing helpful to people and animals in regenerating organs and bones damaged from disease, and complete spinal cord injury nerve regeneration (which we are currently researching in case studies). My experience has taught me to repair immune systems and blood disorders and infections by raising blood counts and stabilizing vital functions. I learned from my other dogs, who had seizures, to redirect nerve-brain electromagnetic abnormalities, disconnections and misfirings. That knowledge is reflected in my specialties of helping people with Multiple Sclerosis, brain damage, epileptic seizures, Parkinson's disease, spinal cord injury, paralysis, neuropathy and other nerve and brain disorders. I learned from healing my cats to repair and seal up wounds. We are currently researching healing pressure ulcers in sedentary patients

Today, as I work with clients, I am eternally grateful for all of the healing gifts that Friend inspired in me that were activated through my love for and from him.

IJHC Editor's note:

I have reviewed veterinary records confirming the diagnoses and improvements in Friend.
